be2workscrackdownload .Q: What is the best way to check if the space we're working on contains a running process? I would like to find the best way to check if the space we're working on contains a running process, as seen on this question. Basically, I have a few processes that are running on the machine, and I would like to check if they're still running. Is there a way to do that? I know for windows, it is possible by using the os.scandir() function, I'm not sure if it's possible for Linux. A: You can use psutil's psutil.Process.state() to get a list of running processes. Loop through this list, and if you detect any that are not Terminated or Stopped, then they are running. Here's an example of that: import os from psutil import Process def get_running_processes(): with open('running_processes.txt', 'r') as f: return [p.name for p in Process().running() if p.name not in f.read().split()] with open('running_processes.txt') as f: print get_running_processes() Note that there is no assurance that psutil will pick up non-Terminated or Non-Stopped processes. , the source said. Schools could be closed for the rest of the day because of the influx of interest, the source said. Local schools are closed today but other large schools in the area are open today, the source said. Two more excavations were underway in the area, an official said. Fewer flights and trains in the New Zealand capital as well as Melbourne, Sydney, Perth and regional centres, are expected to turn around 82138339de
