The data.dat is one line of data and the data.gz is a compressed version of the data. I've been writing the code for the compression system using the gzip module. Everything seems to work and I think I've got it to a point that it'll serve my purpose. In other words, I can call: gzFile.write(data) to write the data to disk. The data.gz file compresses and stores the same data into the compressed file just fine. My issue is this: I want the data.gz file to only be read once, and then be deleted. I would like to delete the data.gz file as soon as it is compressed (without requiring the data.gz file to be written to disk first). The compression system works by dynamically creating an array of bytes that represents the file. The data.dat file is processed one line at a time and each line is added to the array. The compress_file function is called and the file is compressed (during which it's name is turned into a filename of data.gz). When gzip is finished with compressing the file, the zfile.close method is called. This turns the compressed file into a file of type data.gz and returns the name of the filename. This name is actually a shell variable and I would like to assign it to a shell variable called filename but instead I get a gzip error because the compressed file is not yet written to disk (assuming a bi-directional write would mean that I could delete the file). The code for the zfile read is: data = "".join(array) try: zfile.read(
